

The 2016 International Summer University focuses on the issue of the current European crisis: the crisis of democracy and European identity. We ask if there is a future for Europe and if yes, in what form it is imaginable. It seems clear that the much-needed democratization of the European project presupposes the politicization of European public discourse. Transnational European political movements, networks, coalitions of civil organizations (including those from Central Europe) need to move into this vacuum to compete for the support of an increasingly transnational public, and by doing so define and redefine European public good. This process is neither fast, nor easy and it is certainly not possible without conflict. We welcome academics and students all around the world to engage in a dialogue about our shared future, the complexities of current transformations, and our growing social responsibility in re-imagining Europe.
